Course Introduction

This course introduces you to international political economy (IPE). As an interdisciplinary field, IPE brings together politics and economics at both the domestic and international levels to analyze global exchanges. We will focus on how state-market interactions affect the distribution of power and wealth. For example, what drives global trade and finance? To what extent is China's economic statecraft reshaping geopolitical orders? What is the association between territorial disputes, climate change, and natural resources? During the term, you will learn various approaches to answering them.
